PUBLISHER'S FOREWORD

The publication of the collection of papers Global security and international relations after the escalation of the Ukrainian crisis was initiated by the Institute for International Politics and Economics and the Faculty of Security of the University of Belgrade, together with prestigious scientific institutions from Italy and the USA – the Department of Political Sciences of the Sapienza University of Rome and Austin Peay State University of Kentucky.

In an era marked by rapid technological advances, changing power dynamics, and global challenges, the field of international relations is constantly evolving. Observation, analysis and continuous monitoring of global trends and phenomena and processes that determine international security is extremely important both for conducting new research and for concrete decisions that should be made by various state institutions in order to overcome current crises. International relations are changing, numerous transformations are taking place through confrontations, which brings us completely new challenges, risks and threats that threaten global, regional and national security.

In three different chapters, in 27 articles, 38 authors from 12 countries (Bulgaria, France, Slovakia, Switzerland, Italy, North Macedonia, Poland, Russia, Serbia, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the USA) discussed the issues of global changes and the role of great powers in those processes, European security architecture (continental security) and regional relations, as well as Balkan regional security in changing international circumstances. The results of those considerations are conclusions that will help further research, improvement of existing and development of new theories of international relations. The review team composed of scientists from China, Hungary, Italy, Mexico, North Macedonia, Poland, Romania, Russia and the USA gave full contribution to this epilogue of the joint project of the publishers of the collection of papers.
